Neutralization and Non-Intercourse, the Problem of the Philippines, Teaching Patriotism and Internationalism, the Progress of Arbitration, Hopeful New Agencies for Peace, etc. On most of these subjects Mrs. Mead has spoken and written often in recent years, and this work is the result of her long-continued and mature thinking on the various problems of the peace movement. In six appendices most valuable information is given in regard to the Peace Congresses, International Conferences, the Hague Conference, Cost of Armaments, the American Peace Society, etc. "Swords and Ploughshares" will be a most helpful source of information and argument to those who are beginning the study of the Peace Movement and wish to fortify themselves with the best arguments in its support.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF NATIONS. By Lucile Gulliver. With a foreword by David Starr Jordan. 293 pages. Price, 60 cts. Copiously illustrated. Boston: Ginn and Company.

This is a "simple, concise, attractive story" of the peace movement for young people. It is intended to serve as a manual of public exercises for the observance of the eighteenth of May, and also as a supplementary reader for the school and the home. Dr. Jordan, president of Leland Stanford Junior University, says that "it serves the purpose for which it is intended better than anything else which has been published." It is full of most interesting information about both war and peace, of the kind which appeals especially to boys. The chapter on "The Arithmetic of War" will, we think, interest the young people even more than the ordinary arithmetic which they carry so fondly under their arms to and from school. "The Geography of Peace" is a chapter finely conceived and well worked out. The last chapter, "The World Brotherhood," explains how the peoples and nations have been gradually coming to know each other, to have dealings with and to feel friendly toward each other. Where the book has been tried, it has been found to awaken much interest among young folks.

ARMAMENTS AND ARBITRATION. By Rear-Admiral A. T. Mahan. 260 pages. Price, $1.40 net. New York and London: Harper and Brothers.

The chapters of this book were originally articles contributed to the North American Review and the Century Magazine. In them Admiral Mahan, a recognized authority on naval subjects, discusses exhaustively the methods of armament and arbitration in their contrasted relations. In his pages are found the ablest arguments that can be advanced at the present time in favor of the maintenance of a system of highly armed force, as, in his view, an essential element of present-day civilization without which it would go to the wall. On the other hand, what he considers the necessary limitations of arbitration as a method of settling controversies between independent and sovereign states are fully and frankly pointed out. It would, of course, be impossible to give anything like a critical review of the reasoning of the book without devoting many pages of this paper to it. This cannot be done, and we must be content simply to point out the general thesis of the book, and ask our friends to read the work themselves. All workers for a system of unlimited arbitration ought to be acquainted with what Admiral Mahan says, in order to be able to point out the fallacies and the incompleteness of his reasoning. It is needless to say that Admiral Mahan's style is almost unsurpassed in its clearness and attractiveness.
